

FAITH at WORK

Things to consider as you brainstorm project ideas...

When brainstorming ideas for a volunteer service project, there are several things to consider. First, think about the needs of the community you want to serve. What are the biggest challenges facing this community, and how can you address them through your project? It's also important to consider your own skills and resources, as well as those of your team. What are you uniquely qualified to do, and what resources do you have available to you? Finally, think about the impact you want to make with your project. What kind of change do you hope to effect, and how will you measure your success? By considering these factors and working collaboratively with others, you can develop a project that makes a real difference in the lives of those you serve!

- Brainstorm with your volunteers to gather their ideas
- Enlist "prayer warriors" who can serve even if not physically able to in other ways
- Drive or walk around your community with an eye toward services needs and opportunities
- Talk to the Mayor or County Commissioner(s) to assess needs and opportunities to serve
- Ask the Principals of local schools how volunteers of any ages may serve them
- Approach the Ministerial Alliance with the mission of Faith at Work and how your team can get involved in the local community
- Ask non-profit leaders or community help organizations (such as County Extension Offices) how volunteers could assist the community
- Ask Veterans Organizations (VFW) about local veteran needs
- Ask local 4-H leaders what service projects they are doing or plan to do
